Virtue Ethics

What Is Virtue Ethics?

- Developed by Aristotle in the Nicomachean Ethics
- Focuses on character rather than rules or consequences
- Central question: What kind of person should I be?
- A virtue is a stable disposition to feel and act well

Virtue ethics is one of the three major normative theories in ethics. Unlike deontology, which focuses on duties and rules, and consequentialism, which evaluates actions by their outcomes, virtue ethics centers on the character of the moral agent. Aristotle argued that ethics begins not with the question “What should I do?” but “What kind of person should I be?” A virtue, on his account, is not merely a habit of acting in certain ways but a stable disposition to feel, choose, and act appropriately across a range of situations.

The Virtues and the Mean

- Virtues are the mean between two vices (excess and deficiency)
- Example: courage lies between cowardice (deficiency) and recklessness (excess)
- The mean is relative to the person and circumstances
- Phronesis (practical wisdom) guides us to the right mean

Aristotle’s doctrine of the mean holds that each virtue is a middle ground between two corresponding vices — one of excess and one of deficiency. For example, generosity is the mean between miserliness and profligacy. Crucially, the mean is not a fixed mathematical midpoint but is relative to the individual and the situation. This is why practical wisdom (phronesis) is the architectonic virtue: it is the capacity to discern what the situation calls for and to respond accordingly. Without phronesis, the other virtues cannot be exercised well.

Eudaimonia: The Good Life

- The goal of a virtuous life is eudaimonia — human flourishing
- Not mere pleasure or wealth, but living and doing well as a human being
- Eudaimonia is an activity of the soul in accordance with virtue
- Requires a complete life — not achievable in a single moment

Eudaimonia, often translated as “happiness,” is better rendered as “flourishing” or “living well.” For Aristotle, eudaimonia is not a subjective feeling but an objective condition: it is the activity of the soul in accordance with virtue over a complete lifetime. This means that a person cannot flourish in isolation or in a single moment — flourishing requires the sustained exercise of virtues within a community. One classic objection is whether severe misfortune (poverty, illness, the death of loved ones) can undermine eudaimonia even in a virtuous person. Aristotle acknowledges that external goods matter, though he insists that virtue is the most important component of the good life.
